Texas' Isolated Electric Grid Could Add Outside Ties

Last summer, when the brutal heat strained Texas' electric grid and increased worries about blackouts, the grid imported a modest amount of power from Mexico and elsewhere in the United States.

"It obviously helped," said Dan Woodfin, the director of system operations for the Electric Reliability Council of Texas, or ERCOT, the grid operator. Those electricity imports amounted, on some August days, to nearly the equivalent of a nuclear reactor's output, or enough to power more than 200,000 homes in the summer.

The Texas electric grid is proudly isolated. While most other states operate on a pair of grids that serve the eastern and western halves of the country, Texas has evolved on its own, in order to keep federal regulators at bay.

But occasionally, like last summer, the Texas grid leans heavily on the few links that connect it electrically to the outside world. Experts say that closer ties with other grids could be in the state's future, even when no crisis is brewing, though state officials do not want too many ties for fear of triggering federal oversight.

"More people are looking at projects and proposing projects than we've seen in the past," said Mark Bruce, a principal at the consulting firm Stratus Energy in Austin.

The Tribune thanks our Supporting Sponsors

One of those proposals is for an approximately $2 billion New Mexico facility called Tres Amigas, which would tie together the three grids in the lower 48 states. Phil Harris, the project's chief executive, said that he planned to break ground in August on the tie between the eastern and western grids; the Texas one would come later.

Another proposal, known as Southern Cross, would involve building a transmission line capable of transferring enough electricity for hundreds of thousands of homes between East Texas and Mississippi, where it could hook into big markets like the Tennessee Valley Authority. The project, to be financed by private investors, could cost close to $2 billion, according to Chris Shugart, the director of asset operations and maintenance for Pattern Energy, the developer.

The Texas grid covers about three-quarters of the state's land area but excludes the Panhandle, El Paso and parts of East Texas. It already has links to other grids. Five "direct current" ties, including three to Mexico, can handle 1,100 megawatts, about 1.5 percent of the grid's peak-time capacity. The ties can go both ways, though ERCOT has the authority to end the export of power during a crisis (Indeed, the ties provided nearly full power at points during last summer's power crunch.) Even in January and February, when there was no crisis, the ties provided roughly 1 percent of ERCOT's power.

"We're not entirely separated from the rest of the country, but we don't have the capability to move significant amounts of power seamlessly," said Calvin Crowder, president of Electric Transmission Texas, which is related to a power company, AEP, that operates some of the "direct current" ties, including one in Laredo.

In addition, three power plants operated by a Nebraska-based company called Tenaska, including one plant deep in Oklahoma, can switch between providing power for the Texas grid and the eastern grid. The plants sell their power to big companies like Shell and Exelon, which decide where to send the power at a given moment. They were built at extra cost, with special controls and equipment to be able to switch between grids.

"It's not like you can just take any plant and say, 'Oh, we're going to make it dual grid today,'" said Todd Jonas, Tenaska's vice president of operations. Even within a plant, some generation units can be sending power to the eastern grid and others to ERCOT at the same time, he said.

Planners of a proposed electricity-storage facility in the Panhandle, which would compress air with surplus energy and then decompress and release power when it is needed, have also envisioned being able to serve both grids.

Texas can also offload some cities to other grids, in a crisis. Presidio, for example, can switch to the Mexican grid if needed, and other cities got connected to the eastern grid in the wake of Hurricane Rita in 2005. The city of College Station is trying to get connected to the eastern grid through a new transmission line so that in emergencies like hurricanes it can switch away from the Texas grid.
